Congress Proposes Panel to Study State of Local News

Inside Radio

The state of local news continues to have the attention of Congress where a bill has been introduced that would create a 13-member commission to examine and report on the factors contributing to the “demise” of local journalism and what policies and proposals could be embraced to “reinvigorate” local news. By Joining Forces, Stations Find New Potential for Boosting Revenue, Content

Current

When Vermont PBS and Vermont Public Radio formally join forces in July, the merged station will have the largest staff of any media outlet in the state.

It's a distinction out of reach for some of the biggest public media stations in the country's largest markets. It's also a sign to officials at both stations of the impact and reach that public broadcasting can have in a state with fewer than 650,000 people.

'Tension' Emerges Between Employers, Employees on Hybrid Work Preferences

HRDive

A different set of preferences is emerging between employers and their employees on how to continue work arrangements after the danger of the pandemic has passed, a survey released May 12 by employment law firm Littler has found. While 4% of employers estimated that most employees prefer to come back full time for in-person work, 28% said they expected to require such an arrangement regardless. Read more.
